If you're used to seeing needle-like spines poking out of your car's rearview mirrors, you know that they may look a little odd. In fact, those bones are actually part of the musculature of a shark's tail. Sharks can also have them, and they're called dorsal fins. But, in all seriousness, if you've just been taking a look at your car's rearview mirror, you might have noticed some strange looking spines sticking out of it. It's actually part of the musculature of your entire body. Your bones! Yep, they're called bones, and they actually are the structural parts of your body. You have 206 of them, for starters. Yes, 206! That's quite a lot! Anyway, they're grouped together into what we call a skeleton. Your skeleton is in the front, and your vertebrae are the most important part. The vertebrae are connected to your spinal cord, which is the main part of your nervous system. Your spinal cord connects with all the important parts of your body, including your brain, your muscles, your eyes, and much, much more. It's pretty important stuff, and your skeleton is there to protect your spinal cord from all the damage it might sustain while driving. It's also there to give you strength, allow you to move, and protect you from injury, especially when your car hits something like a tree or a fence. So, in that respect, your bones do play a big part in your life. The structure of your bones is actually made up of some pretty dense material, and at first glance, you might think that if you hit a fence with your head, it wouldn't hurt at all. As it turns out, however, that's not the case at all. Bone Fracture Your bones are also very important, because they're the parts that help keep your body from breaking. They do this by acting as a shock absorber for damage caused by physical stress. If there's a problem with your bone, it will break. The problem will be solved by your body rebuilding your bone and making it stronger and more durable than before. But if your bone breaks and it can't be repaired, you might see some of your body's important parts get damage and even damage itself. So, even though bones look pretty good on the outside, it's hard to ignore the fact that
