I have application server running Java EE 6 that serves more than 100 concurrent users in the range 1 to 1000. CPU and RAM are also very important resource. On the other hand server has lot of Java objects created by code, so it is quite slow. What is the recommended size of cache for this type of server? Thanks. A: The size of the Java-Object-Cache matters, but unfortunately the type of the objects that are being cached is more important. The general rule of thumb is - the bigger the machine, the bigger the Java-Object-Cache. The type of objects matters, too. You'd want to cache JARs, not plain files. You'll have a cache key, which contains your name. You'd need to cache the actual classes in the JAR, not the JARs themselves (so you'd only need JAR-Cache and not JAR-Cache-Manager, and you'd adjust the cache key accordingly). If you want to cache arbitrary files, you'd better get rid of those Java-Object-Caches. In the enterprise world, you want to cache every business object that is created/accessed/modified/deleted/whatever, because the transaction that created/accessed/modified/deleted the object can be rolled back, so you need to store that transaction-information in the cache as well. Also, you'd need to cache the working-copy (if you don't work with the original) of every object, because someone might modify the object. If you cache them, someone might change the object you want to modify/work with, but with old, cached version, until you rollback the transaction. A: The individual object size is not important (unless you're storing hundreds of thousands of objects). What matters is how many objects you're storing and how many objects are updated in a given batch. The trade-off is always going to be between the size of the cache and the number of objects that can be cached and the time it takes to update the cache. For instance, if you can cache 1000 objects and the time it takes to update

1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a cooling apparatus. 2. Related Background Art It is known that, with the progress of supercomputers, there is an increasing demand for high-speed processing. For this reason, it is also necessary to raise the operation temperature of each of the supercomputer components. If the supercomputer is operated at a high temperature, however, there is a problem that the components would be degraded in the operating life. In order to satisfy such a demand, a cooling apparatus is required which can cool a supercomputer component to a predetermined temperature or less. In order to raise the operating speed of the supercomputer and raise the heat generation from the supercomputer component, it is necessary to increase the heat dissipation amount by a cooling apparatus. Accordingly, it is also required to use a high-performance cooling apparatus. FIG. 7 is a circuit diagram showing the configuration of a conventional cooling apparatus. In this figure, reference numeral 1 denotes a heat-receiving member in the form of an integrated circuit (IC) element, 2 denotes a CPU board, 3 denotes a Peltier element, 4 denotes a circuit board, 5 denotes a heat radiator, and 6 denotes a fan. As shown in FIG. 7, in a conventional cooling apparatus, the heat generated from the IC 1 is dissipated by the Peltier element 3. The Peltier element 3 acts to heat and cool a heat-receiving member by passing a Peltier current. With the above-described configuration, in a conventional cooling apparatus, the Peltier current passes a large current corresponding to the heat dissipation amount from the heat-receiving member, so that a large loss is generated from the Peltier element 3. For this reason
