I have defined a function that consumes the shared object, and it consumes the shared object in a loop. I am running into a MemoryError exception. I have read about global objects and how it can be improved. And I have also read about how manager is meant to be used to improve python multiprocessing. I thought using Manager to share would help, but I am still experiencing the MemoryError. Any help would be appreciated. The function is consuming the shared object 4 times, each round through the loop, and that's where I am at. A: You need to allocate enough memory to hold a copy of the shared object for each worker in the pool. You are running into a RAM issue because each worker is making small allocations, and when you have 256 workers doing that they will quickly exhaust your available RAM. Each of those workers is creating a copy of the dictionary it is using, so creating a single large copy of the dictionary for all workers would not necessarily help. The workers have to allocate their own copies of the dictionary, and they are going to need to allocate enough memory to hold their copy in the first place. I don't have any code to look at to
