Category:Windows-only software Category:Windows softwareQ: On a local system, how does one share a usb driver, if the driver is accessible locally? On a local machine, if a usb device is recognized and a driver is loaded for that device, how does one (or is it even possible) share that driver with another computer or system? A: This is definitely possible. To do this for a USB device, you would want to look into the Windows Device Driver software. There is also a simple but powerful text-file transport system for all classes of devices. This is what I am using to share my 3G dongles between computers (more...) For a local network, you would need to look into Network Driver software (such as Zeroshell) which would allow for shared permissions across multiple computers. There is also a simple but powerful text-file transport system for all classes of devices, which I am currently 55cdc1ed1c
