Tuesday, October 5, 2012 We return to the theme of the fog & the camera, and the poetry of a world that's only just becoming visible. There's no shortage of beautifully-rendered "mysteries" lurking behind a veil of fog & smoke. The above sound-clip belongs to Anuran Khorana, and he's managed to capture a moment near dusk, just as the fog is lifting, and the sun is shining through it to frame the view. This is awesome. And I'm pretty sure the music is by Sambha Somaya... Between them, they define a word that's new to me... toenasam. I'm usually more specific than this, but I've been spending a lot of time on the internet lately, trying to see if I can find out more about what I saw. And I'm not hopeful, in spite of a post from November 2010. The ancient world that created Mesopotamian poetry may have been quite different from ours, but to find poems with such exact counterparts in contemporary languages seems to me pretty unlikely. And I think the people of Mesopotamia would have thought so too. Here's a contemporary Indian version of a [recent] poem I already knew (at least in English). Poem by Anuran Khorana I saw a birding over a garden sitting on the well-head The wind blow fast from the sea
